But then it happened that one of them stumbled on some brush, and this dislodged from Snow-White's throat the piece of poisoned apple that she had bitten off. Do not let anyone in." Now the queen, believing that she had eaten Snow-White's lungs and liver, could only think that she was again the first and the most beautiful woman of all. She was a beautiful woman, but she was proud and arrogant, and she could not stand it if anyone might surpass her in beauty. Back at home the queen stepped before her mirror and said: Mirror, mirror, on the wall, Who in this land is fairest of all? And as soon as the child was born, the queen died. She had a magic mirror. Snow-White lay there in the coffin a long, long time, and she did not decay, but looked like she was asleep, for she was still as white as snow and as red as blood, and as black-haired as ebony wood. Every morning she stood before it, looked at herself, and said: Mirror, mirror, on the wall, Who in this land is fairest of all? But nothing helped. Three drops of blood fell into the snow. Snow-White grew up and became ever more beautiful. But anyone who might eat a little piece of it would die. He saw the coffin on the mountain with beautiful Snow-White in it, and he read what was written on it with golden letters. Substantial changes were introduced with the second edition (1819). In this disguise she went to the house of the seven dwarfs. Not long afterward she opened her eyes, lifted the lid from her coffin, sat up, and was alive again. Then her envious heart was at rest, as well as an envious heart can be at rest. The animals too came and mourned for Snow-white, first an owl, then a raven, and finally a dove. Snow-White longed for the beautiful apple, and when she saw that the peasant woman was eating part of it she could no longer resist, and she stuck her hand out and took the poisoned half. When she was seven years old she was as beautiful as the light of day, even more beautiful than the queen herself. Against the wall there were seven little beds, all standing in a row and covered with snow-white sheets. But Snow-White, beyond the mountains With the seven dwarfs, Is still a thousand times fairer than you. "You specimen of beauty," said the wicked woman, "now you are finished." And she walked away. Just then a young boar came running by. How terrified they were when they saw their dear Snow-White lying on the ground, not moving at all, as though she were dead. Source: Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, Sneewittchen, Kinder- und Hausmärchen, (Children's and Household Tales -- Grimms' Fairy Tales), final edition (Berlin, 1857), no. He killed it, cut out its lungs and liver, and took them back to the queen as proof of Snow-White's death. They examined her and found the poisoned comb. The child liked it so much that she let herself be deceived, and she opened the door. Thus she went across the seven mountains to the seven dwarfs, and called out, "Good wares for sale, for sale!" Snow-White looked out and said, "Go on your way. After putting on her beautiful clothes she stepped before her mirror and said: Mirror, mirror, on the wall, Who in this land is fairest of all? In the first edition, presumably the version closest to its oral sources, Snow-White's jealous antagonist is her own mother, not a stepmother. They lit their seven candles, and as soon as it was light in their house they saw that someone had been there, for not everything was in the same order as they had left it. Once again they warned her to be on guard and not to open the door for anyone. To this the mirror answered: You, my queen, are fairest of all. Fortunately it was almost evening, and the seven dwarfs came home. "Oh good heaven! Oh good heaven!" they cried. They combed her hair. There was a little table with a white tablecloth and seven little plates, and each plate had a spoon, and there were seven knives and forks and seven mugs as well. When they saw Snow-White lying on the ground as if she were dead, they immediately suspected her stepmother. The prince had his servants carry it away on their shoulders. Their wedding was planned with great splendor and majesty. Come with me to my father's castle. I will honor her and respect her as my most cherished one." As he thus spoke, the good dwarfs felt pity for him and gave him the coffin. They lifted her up and looked for something poisonous. Link to a translation of Little Snow-White, version of 1812. You shall become my wife." Snow-White loved him, and she went with him. The good dwarfs warned her, saying, "Be careful about your stepmother. The red on the white looked so beautiful that she thought to herself, "If only I had a child as white as snow, as red as blood, and as black as the wood in this frame." Soon afterward she had a little daughter who was as white as snow, as red as blood, and as black as ebony wood, and therefore they called her Little Snow-White. Because she was so hungry and thirsty Snow-White ate a few vegetables and a little bread from each little plate, and from each mug she drank a drop of wine. The wicked woman uttered a curse, and she became so frightened, so frightened, that she did not know what to do. Then, coloring her face, she disguised herself as a peasant woman, and thus went across the seven mountains to the seven dwarfs. They said, "We cannot bury her in the black earth," and they had a transparent glass coffin made, so she could be seen from all sides. She barely had a bite in her mouth when she fell to the ground dead. "How did you find your way to our house?" the dwarfs asked further. They undid her laces. Ashliman. Then she began to run. She had to go and see the young queen. They washed her with water and wine. After dark the masters of the house returned home. Not long afterward, in the evening time, the seven dwarfs came home. "Would you like this one?" "I can let that honest woman in," thought Snow-White, then unbolted the door and bought the pretty bodice lace. When she heard that, all her blood ran to her heart because she knew that Snow-White had come back to life. Once upon a time in midwinter, when the snowflakes were falling like feathers from heaven, a queen sat sewing at her window, which had a frame of black ebony wood. They had scarcely pulled it out when Snow-White came to herself again and told them what had happened. I will run into the wild woods and never come back." Because she was so beautiful the huntsman took pity on her, and he said, "Run away, you poor child." He thought, "The wild animals will soon devour you anyway," but still it was as if a stone had fallen from his heart, for he would not have to kill her. As she sewed she looked up at the snow and pricked her finger with her needle. Translator's notes: Both elements of the heroine's name Sneewittchen are in Low German, although the tale itself was recorded in High German. She was forced to step into the red-hot shoes and dance until she fell down dead. The envy and pride grew ever greater, like a weed in her heart, until she had no peace day and night. Then they put a pair of iron shoes into burning coals. Then she disguised herself, taking the form of a different old woman. The cook had to boil them with salt, and the wicked woman ate them, supposing that she had eaten Snow-White's lungs and liver. They fetched their seven candles and shone the light on Snow-White. The poor child was now all alone in the great forest, and she was so afraid that she just looked at all the leaves on the trees and did not know what to do. "Child," said the old woman, "how you look! Come, let me lace you up properly." The unsuspecting Snow-White stood before her and let her do up the new lace, but the old woman pulled so quickly and so hard that Snow-White could not breathe. The seventh dwarf had to sleep with his companions, one hour with each one, and then the night was done. The first one said, "Who has been sitting in my chair?" The second one, "Who has been eating from my plate?" The third one, "Who has been eating my bread?" The fourth one, "Who has been eating my vegetables?" The fifth one, "Who has been sticking with my fork?" The sixth one, "Who has been cutting with my knife?" The seventh one, "Who has been drinking from my mug?" Then the first one saw a that there was a little imprint in his bed, and said, "Who stepped on my bed?" The others came running up and shouted, "Someone has been lying in mine as well!" But the seventh one, looking at his bed, found Snow-White lying there asleep. It finally answered: You, my queen, are fairest of all. This startled the queen, for she knew that the mirror did not lie, and she realized that the huntsman had deceived her, and that Snow-White was still alive. "Good heavens, where am I?" she cried out. She will soon know that you are here. He took out his hunting knife and was about to stab it into her innocent heart when she began to cry, saying, "Oh, dear huntsman, let me live. In the first edition the apple is dislodged when a servant, angry for having to carry Snow-White's coffin wherever the prince goes, strikes the sleeping princess. Kill her, and as proof that she is dead bring her lungs and her liver back to me." The huntsman obeyed and took Snow-White into the woods. The dear child was dead, and she remained dead. The dwarfs said, "If you will keep house for us, and cook, make beds, wash, sew, and knit, and keep everything clean and orderly, then you can stay with us, and you shall have everything that you want." "Yes," said Snow-White, "with all my heart." So she kept house for them. Then she was satisfied, for she knew that the mirror spoke the truth. They were the seven dwarfs who picked and dug for ore in the mountains. 53. "Bodice laces in all colors." And she took out one that was braided from colorful silk. "This child is so beautiful!" They were so happy, that they did not wake her up, but let her continue to sleep there in the bed. After they had agreed on the purchase, the old woman said, "Now let me comb your hair properly." She had barely stuck the comb into Snow-White's hair when the poison took effect, and the girl fell down unconscious. The Grimms' source: Marie Hassenpflug (1788-1856) and other informants. She was not breathing at all. The mirror answered once again: You, my queen, are fair; it is true. Here, I'll give you one of them." "No," said Snow-White, "I cannot accept anything." "Are you afraid of poison?" asked the old woman. It answered: You, my queen, are fair; it is true. One day when the queen asked her mirror: Mirror, mirror, on the wall, Who in this land is fairest of all? They were going to bury her, but she still looked as fresh as a living person, and still had her beautiful red cheeks. At first she did not want to go to the wedding, but she found no peace. At last she thought of something. Translated by D. "This time," she said, "I shall think of something that will destroy you." Then with the art of witchcraft, which she understood, she made a poisoned comb. She ran over sharp stones and through thorns, and wild animals jumped at her, but they did her no harm. A year later the king took himself another wife. Inside the house everything was small, but so neat and clean that no one could say otherwise. I never want to see her again. When the dwarfs heard what had happened they said, "The old peddler woman was no one else but the goddess queen. Knocking on the door she called out, "Beautiful wares for sale, for sale!" Snow-White peered out the window and said, "Good day, dear woman, what do you have for sale?" "Good wares, beautiful wares," she answered. The mirror answered: You, my queen, are fair; it is true. She was dead. Then he said to the dwarfs, "Let me have the coffin. She stepped before her mirror and said: Mirror, mirror, on the wall, Who in this land is fairest of all? You eat the red half, and I shall eat the white half." Now the apple had been so artfully made that only the red half was poisoned. Take care and let no one in when we are not with you." When the wicked woman returned home she went to her mirror and asked: Mirror, mirror, on the wall, Who in this land is fairest of all? She knocked on the door. I am not allowed to let anyone in." "You surely may take a look," said the old woman, pulling out the poisoned comb and holding it up. Then she told them that her stepmother had tried to kill her, that the huntsman had spared her life, and that she had run the entire day, finally coming to their house. The queen looked at her with a gruesome stare, laughed loudly, and said, "White as snow, red as blood, black as ebony wood! This time the dwarfs cannot awaken you." Back at home she asked her mirror: Mirror, mirror, on the wall, Who in this land is fairest of all? "You used to be the most beautiful one," said the old woman, and hurried away. Coloring her face, she disguised herself as an old peddler woman, so that no one would recognize her. They were brought forth with tongs and placed before her. Then she thought, and thought again, how she could kill Snow-White, for as long as long as she was not the most beautiful woman in the entire land her envy would give her no rest. "Look, I'll cut the apple in two. They lifted her up, and, seeing that she was too tightly laced, they cut the lace in two. Afterward, because she was so tired, she lay down on a bed, but none of them felt right -- one was too long, the other too short -- until finally the seventh one was just right. L. © 2002-2005. The queen took fright and turned yellow and green with envy. Now it came to pass that a prince entered these woods and happened onto the dwarfs' house, where he sought shelter for the night. But the young queen is a thousand times fairer than you. "I'll easily get rid of my apples. Links to related sites Revised November 15, 2005. Snow-White stuck her head out the window and said, "I am not allowed to let anyone in. When she arrived she recognized Snow-White, and terrorized, she could only stand there without moving. During the day the girl was alone. From the outside it was beautiful, white with red cheeks, and anyone who saw it would want it. Every morning they went into the mountains looking for ore and gold, and in the evening when they came back home their meal had to be ready. The seven dwarfs all came running up, and they cried out with amazement. But they were friendly and asked, "What is your name?" "My name is Snow-White," she answered. The prince said joyfully, "You are with me." He told her what had happened, and then said, "I love you more than anything else in the world. When the queen heard the mirror saying this, she shook and trembled with anger, "Snow-White shall die," she shouted, "if it costs me my life!" Then she went into her most secret room -- no one else was allowed inside -- and she made a poisoned, poisoned apple. Then she summoned a huntsman and said to him, "Take Snow-White out into the woods. The dwarfs have forbidden me to do so." "That is all right with me," answered the peasant woman. From that hour on whenever she looked at Snow-White her heart turned over inside her body, so great was her hatred for the girl. Beginning with the edition of 1819, the poisoned apple is dislodged when a servant accidentally stumbles while carrying the coffin to the prince's castle. They laid her inside, and with golden letters wrote on it her name, and that she was a princess. Some differences between the edition of 1812 and later versions: Beginning with the edition of 1819, the Grimms add the statement that Snow-White's mother died during childbirth, and that her father remarried. She remained lying in it, entrusted herself to God, and fell asleep. Then she began to breathe a little, and little by little she came back to life. This tale was included in the first edition (1812) and all following editions of the Grimms' Kinder- und Hausmärchen. They laid her on a bier, and all seven sat next to her and mourned for her and cried for three days. She ran as far as her feet could carry her, and just as evening was about to fall she saw a little house and went inside in order to rest. Then they put the coffin outside on a mountain, and one of them always stayed with it and watched over her. Snow-White's godless stepmother was also invited to the feast. The next morning Snow-White woke up, and when she saw the seven dwarfs she was frightened. The High German form of the heroine's name would be Schneeweissen or Schneeweißchen. When the dwarfs came home that evening they found Snow-White lying on the ground. But Snow-White is a thousand times fairer than you. I will give you anything you want for it." But the dwarfs answered, "We will not sell it for all the gold in the world." Then he said, "Then give it to me, for I cannot live without being able to see Snow-White.

American McGee's Grimm is a 23-part episodic video game series based upon Grimm's Fairy Tales, designed by American McGee, developed by Spicy Horse and distributed online initially by GameTap starting July 31, 2008. Grimm was originally thought to resemble the warped fairy tale style of American McGee's Alice, but the art style appears to be much more child-friendly and ... 30/07/2021 · IGN is the leading site for movies with expert reviews, trailers, interviews, news, wikis, cast pictures, release dates and movie posters The Brothers Grimm (or Die Gebrüder Grimm), Jacob (1785–1863) and Wilhelm Grimm (1786–1859), were German academics, linguists, cultural researchers, lexicographers and authors who together collected and published folklore.
